

A Car Accident

Last week, Ryan had an accident. That morning, he had forgotten to set the alarm clock and woke up late, so he was late to school. When he wanted to take the lift, it was out of order. He ran down the stairs as quick as he could because he was in a hurry.

Ryan arrived at the traffic lights after two minutes. At the pedestrian crossing, Ryan was in a rush so he ran across the crossing when the traffic lights were red and a taxi knocked him down. At the same time, I was on my way to school. I saw Ryan in the accident, so I called the ambulance. Ryan felt dizzy and his body was extremely painful and was badly injured.

At the end, luckily Ryan was alive but he needed to sit in a wheelchair and he lost some of his memory. It took him a few weeks to recover. He learnt not to run across the crossing when the traffic lights are red.